COVID-ERA FLEXIBILITIES IN MEDICARE AND MEDICAID COULD ADVANCE PERSON-CENTERED CARE

Experts Provide Framework to Support Policy Decisions on the Future of Program Flexibilities

Long Beach, CA, March 23, 2022—Older adults and people with complex needs have benefited from easier access to critical services and supports at home and in their community, such as telehealth, due to flexibilities in Medicare and Medicaid granted under the COVID-19 public health emergency (PHE). Now as regulations changed during the PHE are expiring, some person-centered care options might be at risk.

Researchers at Health Management Associates and Manatt Health, through support from The SCAN Foundation, found many of these flexibilities minimize administrative, clinical, and financial barriers while significantly advancing equitable care that could be elevated in the post-pandemic era.

Medicare provides coverage to more than 61 million older adults and younger people with disabilities, while Medicaid provides coverage to more than 76 million Americans, 12 million of whom are “dually eligible” and enrolled in both programs. Researchers say the PHE flexibilities had far-reaching effects on older adults and people with disabilities yet are still temporary and could end shortly after the PHE expires.

“Some of the temporary flexibilities granted during the pandemic sparked the most innovation in Medicare and Medicaid seen in decades,” said Dr. Sarita A. Mohanty, president & CEO of The SCAN Foundation. “When well implemented, enhancements to these two major government programs have the potential to advance equitable, person-centered, and community-focused care now and in the future.”

To help policymakers decide whether to make changes to the two programs permanent, researchers developed a framework for assessing the “person-centeredness” of the flexibilities (defined as care that is guided by an individual’s personal values and preferences and is designed to help people achieve what matters most to them). As policymakers make decisions about whether and which flexibilities should be made permanent through policy action, the framework helps policymakers make evidence-based choices.

“There are many COVID-19-related flexibilities related to telehealth, provider scope of practice, Medicare Advantage, and other areas that if made permanent, could make Medicare a more person-centered and equitable program,” said Jennifer Podulka, principal at Health Management Associates.

“Developing a person-centered framework to guide policymakers as they assess the impact of the temporary Medicare and Medicaid flexibilities has never been more important, particularly for the over 12 million people who are enrolled in both programs,” said Stephanie Anthony, senior advisor at Manatt Health. “We hope this framework provides a tool for federal and state policymakers to assess opportunities for removing misalignments between Medicare and Medicaid programs that adversely impact individuals and providers participating in both programs."

Their joint issue brief examines the benefits and risks of COVID-19 flexibilities, describes the person-centered assessment framework, and offers recommendations for flexibilities that could be considered for permanence. The companion policymaker playbook is an actionable guide for using the person-centered assessment framework and describes potential authorities for making flexibilities permanent.

On March 30, the Health Management Associates and Manatt Health researchers will discuss their recent work as well as options to maintain and strengthen the Medicare and Medicaid flexibilities for future generations.
